

Donkeys Run In Circles When Excited

The more of them that get excited the bigger the circle.

This tidbit of important knowledge comes to us directly from the Bayou City Bull's own Australian correspondent. He knows because he witnessed the routine commercial roundup of Donkeys to be used in making pet food, fertilizer and sundry other animal by-products. Apparently they used to use kangaroos as well, but the kangaroo lobby grew too strong, [They do look kind of like big funny rabbits, anyway.] and capturing or grinding them up is no longer politically correct. Rumor has it that even in Mexico donkeys may be found in some unusual places by American tastes. It would seem that only in American politics is the donkey lobby alive and well.

This, coupled with the tendency of donkeys to run in circles when excited, raises several questions worthy of answers.

- Does this behavior pattern affect all Democrats?
- Do different types of excitement produce different geometric patterns?

For example:

There is the pre-impeachment dance which looked a lot like the "I never inhaled" dance.

Then there is the presidential tent raising dance [or is that skirt raising?]. Talk about getting caught with one's pants down.

We must not forget the finger pointing dances or the denial dances.

Do "gay" donkeys do a different kind of dance?

With all this running in circles, is there a hidden message in the shape of the "oval office?"
