

News Release:

Cannibals Prefer SPAM!

Chief YumYum Eat'em-up of the Obowallawalla tribe one of the most famous cannibal tribes ever interviewed, recently declared SPAM to be his tribe's favorite food, because it tasted so much like people.

"What's more," he said, "we don't have to wait around for strangers to show up anymore. There's no more of that messy preparation to do. When we are hungry, we just pop open a can and eat."

Their Island has recently opened a new tourist welcome center which is filled with a staggering collection of momentos from their rich and colored history. The center itself is treat to behold as it is made from left over SPAM cans and lids.

The Chief suggested that visitors bring several cases when they come, for each week they plan to stay. Be sure to bring a good can opener or pair of metal shears, tools for making holes in sheet metal and lots of pop rivets to help in constructing their latest project, a state-of-the-art office complex made entirely from empty SPAM cans.

What is SPAM?

According to disreputable sources, it can be described as a collection of unsellable parts and drippings [that may not have actually hit the floor], uniformly shaped, textured, colored and flavored, which are cooked to kill any microbes that may be lurking about, then canned.

shelf life: indefinite texture: nondescript [other sources describe it as a lot like what you might get if you took some three day old lumpy oatmeal, pressed it into a brick shape, then sliced it a few days later.]

taste; Cannibals are reported to prefer SPAM profit margin: astronomical primary markets: military, cannibals, anyone whose taste buds were shot off in the the war.

Did you hear the one about the cannibal who passed his brother in the jungle?

© 2000 Stephen Ruback, Published with author's permission in the Bayou City Bull